1. In the fall of 1947 a new wave of persecutions and deportations took place in southern Albania in connection with the Communist activity along the frontier. A number of zones along the frontier from Konispol to Lake Prespa were evacuated by the police and the Peoples Guard of large groups of civilians suspected of sympathies toward the Greek Government or of hostility toward the present Albanian regime.
2. Two concentration camps for political internees, one at Argirocastro and the other at Korce, were emptied during the last ten days of December 1947 and the internees transported to a temporary camp near Berat, which is further north. It was thought prudent by Albanian officials to remove these internees because of the unresolved military situation following the failure of the Greeks to take Konitsa.
3. The resumption of the Markos guerrilla fighting has resulted in an intensification of the activities of Albanian nationalist and anti-Communist groups in the interior of the country. By the fall of 1947 these groups had been reduced to small nuclei, but have now been strengthened by new elements who joined them during the last wave of persecution.
4. Of the new opposition groups, the most significant are the following in northern Albania:
 - a. The Mirdizia group of Catholic mountaineers headed by Bib Gjon Markaj Gjon Markaj.
 - b. The group in the Puka zone east of Scutari led by Pusuk Bib Mirakaj.
 - c. The group of the Grande Malissia directed by Kastrato Gjalosh.
5. Other opposition groups are the following:
 - a. Orthodox Albanians led by Ferid Unisku in the Skrapar zone.
 - b. A group headed by Hamid Matjari in the Lushnja area in the Shkumbi valley.
